OF INTEREST TO WOMEN

BY VIRGINIA WESTOVER.
Correspondents are requested to send communications on subjects in which they are interested and regarding which they desire information to the Editor of the Woman's Page.

On an early March day in 1862, a princess, wife of the heir to the English throne, radiant in her girlish loveliness, landed at Gravesend. The English people, forgetting their proverbial reserve, took this beautiful daughter of the Vikings at once to their hearts. In the years that have passed since that welcome to a royal bride, Alexandra, now Queen of England, has had her allotted share of sorrow and suffering, and has never shunned the duties and exactions of public life. Yet now that she is almost sixty-six years old, she looks younger than her youngest daughter, and women in England and America have fallen in the habit of wondering if she has not found the fountain of perpetual youth, and quaffed from it so deep a draught that she is able to defy the ravages of time. Perhaps if all women were to follow Alexandra's example there would be a noticeable absence of wrinkles and a general lessening of the burden of years among the members of the feminine sex. Believing it to be her duty to her family and the world, Alexandra has done much toward keeping herself fair and pure by the exercise of self-control, and the cultivation of all the sweetest and tenderest virtues. She has never indulged in anger, and has banished resolutely from her mind sources of irritation and vexation. She has taken care of her health and strength, and has warded off attacks of illness by relaxation and absolute rest. She always prepares herself with scrupulous care, as to massage and the arts of the toilet for the great court functions. She keeps her skin fresh and smooth by a temperate and simple diet, by her open-air life at Sandringham in her gardens and her dairy. While she is ardent in temperament and full of life, she avoids exciting sports and strenuous pastimes. This does not seem to be such a difficult regimen. What the Queen of England has done, all women may do by calling perseverance and courage to their aid.

These are the days in which women are obsessed by the humanities. And yet this phase of life is but repeating itself, for a seventh-century European woman who helped to make the history of her day, challenges comparison in achievement with any who have or may come after her. This woman, named Bathildis, has her picture drawn by Eleanor, a Kinnicutt in Serber's Magazine for December. She lived in the year 648, and was first a fair-haired Saxon thrall in a French mayor's kitchen.

Beautiful she must have been, for the Mayor courted her, and King Clovis II, of France, fell in love with her. Him she married and became the mother of future kings. When her husband, Clovis, died, Bathildis was appointed regent, and began at once to carry out the cherished desire of her heart, the abolition of slavery in France. She abolished yearly individual taxation, equal in amount to the price paid for a child, as a first step toward accomplishing her desires. The slaves already in bondage she redeemed with money taken from her privy purse, and she enacted a fugitive slave law to prevent the sale of French children in other countries; the home market being closed. At the close of her regency, she retired to the convent of Cella, near Paris. She died in the year 680, and is buried in the Cathedral of Notre Dame. What twentieth century woman will be found worthy of a place beside her on the page of history?

The creator of the severe satin evening gown only puts in the judicious touches which soften it into becomingness. A new model in faint shell pink has the material folded across the bust and hanging straight from the waist line, to show a piece of lacy ruffled rhinestone embroidery. Over both shoulders starting from where the satin bodice ends, run two sashes of black tulle on a satin foundation. Yellow is also a favorite color of the early winter for young girls who are no longer debutantes. A young girl noted for her exquisite taste was recently at an evening entertainment a yellow chiffon over a soft silk foundation. The chiffon was hand embroidered and made in the simplest, straightest possible lines, emphasizing the slenderness of the figure it inclosed. A necklace of topazes in Every year an unheeded volume is written regarding the necessity for economy on the part of women Christmas shoppers. These shoppers are told of the wonderful cheapness of home-made Christmas presents, and of how a morsel of silk and lace, combined with a bit of ribbon and two or three inches of this and that, will produce wonderful results when put together by clever fingers. And at the cost of only a few cents! Perhaps it does seem cheap when counted in money. But what of the extravagance of time and labor? What of the hours in which fingers ache, eyes are strained over embroidery and nerves and temper strung to the breaking point? Perhaps, after all, a simple remembrance costing a few pennies more than the materials to be elaborated, often at the expense of health and temper, would really be the truer economy. When hours of much needed rest are devoted to scallops and minute stitchery, the gift that is their outcome is robbed of its real value and significance.
